CHARACTER MAP v2.1

CHARACTER NAME Talatavael yr Hama el Tahlir yi Calimport

ORIGIN OF URGE

Born into a Calishite merchant house → "Status is everything."

Half-elf, father never spoken of → "Some truths are better managed than confessed."

Mother's relentless lessons in etiquette, history, the dance → "If I perform perfectly, they might overlook what doesn't fit."

Never fully accepted despite effort → "Belonging is conditional - earned, never given."

Refused a degrading match at nineteen, cast out of the house → "Security can vanish overnight."

Found stability in institutions - temple, then Fist → "Rules are shelter. Bend them, but never step outside."

CORE URGE

A compulsion.

In order to survive / get my needs met, I must...

maintain control through strategic rule-breaking while appearing legitimate.

▼ CONSCIOUS

STATED BELIEF (LIE)

Unhealthy people usually aren't conscious of the fact that their urges are coping mechanisms, so they create a narrative to justify the core urge.

I'm not corrupt, I'm practical.
I'm not compromised, I'm effective.
I haven't lost my principles -
I've refined them.

THE CORE URGE AFFECTS ALL AREAS OF THEIR LIFE

GOALS

Keep her post in the Flaming Fist - not out of ambition, but because it's a roof, a wage and some authority.

Build quiet influence so she never has to fight for anything openly. Never again be cast out or dependent on anyone's approval.

What she actually wants, and won't say: a small ordinary life - a courtyard, a lemon tree, nothing happening.

RELATIONSHIPS

Keeps connections transactional until trust is proven, then guards them fiercely - sometimes past the point of sense.

Among fellow officers: professional, distant, respected but "difficult." Few would cover for her.

Sex is fine. Intimacy is dangerous.

LIFESTYLE

Lives like a soldier.

Routine gives her rhythm - patrols, reports, training. Routine means nothing unexpected.

Personal comfort feels undeserved, so she fills the silence with duty.

Saves little. Assumes the future is uncertain - and has no plan for it if it isn't.

PRESENTATION

Utilitarian: functional armour, no adornment without purpose.

Public image: "tough but fair" officer, efficient, incorruptible.

Cultivates that myth carefully.

DIALOGUE

Blunt with those beneath her - recruits, criminals. Careful, polished and deferential with those above.

Dry, sardonic humour - often the only shape in which she can say something true.

Traces of a formal education surface in phrasing, polished but sharp-edged.

MORE CHARACTER ATTRIBUTES

These can reflect the core urge, but they don't have to.

MOOD/TEMPERAMENT

Outwardly calm, almost austere, but not cold. The calm is learned - a steady current of anxiety she has simply learned to walk on top of. Her crudeness is deliberate, a way to test people and hold her ground - except in bed, the one place she lets herself be unguarded. Anger rarely shows; it goes quiet and careful in the moment and comes out later, alone. She doesn't trust happiness and finds comfort in order and work done right - though she is slowly learning to hold good things while she has them.

SKILLS

A paladin of the Oath of the Crown - sworn to order, not glory. Rules are the closest thing she has to safety. Competent enough with a sword to survive, never good enough to feel safe. Avoids fights wherever talk will do. Rose through the Fist on paperwork, investigations and negotiation rather than combat.
Reads people well - a habit from a childhood spent watching for the moment she'd stop being welcome. Fluent in Alzhedo, Chondathan and the language of authority. Can make a threat sound like advice, so she rarely has to back one up. Lives in quiet dread of the day someone calls the bluff.

HABITS/ADDICTIONS

Work fills every gap - the more she controls, the less can surprise her. When control slips, she seeks noise: a drink, a crowd, someone else's bed - comfort for the body that asks nothing of the heart.
Avoids rest. Sleep brings dreams, dreams bring Calimport - and the faces of the few she's killed. Drinks more than she should, but functions too well for anyone to call it a problem - including herself.

TASTES/PREFERENCES

Likes her world quiet and orderly; quarters bare, every item with a purpose. One indulgence: fine Calishite soap - expensive, unnecessary, quietly sentimental. Hates perfume, but keeps the faint scent of spice and myrrh close, as if it keeps her mother near.
Respects competence over morality, directness over charm. Drawn to dangerous people who don't pretend to be safe.

HOBBIES

Trains when restless - not because she loves it, but because drilled hands shake less. Patrols when she can't sleep. Boot rhythm on stone steadies her thoughts.
Tavern drinks are half comfort, half reconnaissance. A way to stay part of the city without belonging to it. Cards and dice: likes calculating odds and reading tells. Loses more often than she admits.

How could someone trick or manipulate this character?

WEAKNESSES

Fights frighten her. Killing frightens her more. In a crisis she freezes for a heartbeat - then goes anyway, especially if civilians are in the way.
Her informant network is leverage against her. Loyalty is absolute once given - betrayal devastates her. Cannot admit weakness without feeling like that nineteen-year-old on the docks. Vulnerability equals abandonment. Leaves before she can be left - and calls it foresight.
The weakness she doesn't see: becoming what she hated - someone who performs a role so well she loses track of what's real underneath.

VALUES

Loyalty is sacred but must be earned. She tests it constantly, expecting failure, and rarely notices how often she fails her own test. Precision over purity. Justice isn't divine - it's human, flawed, and still worth enforcing.
Respect is owed to competence, not rank. Worth must be proven, never assumed. She'd rather trust a skilled criminal than an incompetent officer.
Order keeps people alive, but not all rules are worth following. She has appointed herself arbiter of which protect people and which protect power.

Bio/Backstory:

[Narrator clears throat]

Tav became a Flaming Fist the same way some people join cults or pyramid schemes - out of desperation and a lack of better options.

Born into a Calishite merchant family with rigid traditions and flexible ethics, Talatavael, a half-wood-elf, was the expected mix of good manners, sarcasm and inconvenient bloodlines. Her father was an elf her mother met up north and never mentioned again; her mother was a woman who loved her and prepared her, with grim devotion, for a market that saw daughters as export goods. At nineteen Tav was offered exactly one husband, took one look at him, and said no. Tradition handled her like any bad investment - cut her loose and wished her well. No marriage - no home. Simple Calishite maths.

Baldur's Gate welcomed her the way it welcomes all strays - with open arms and closed wallets. The temple offered all-inclusive salvation: bed, board, and a set of rules nobody could take away from her. She took the Oath of the Crown, not for honour but for structure. Tav liked knowing the rules before breaking them.

She never fully bought into the god stuff, but she repeated the prayers and played the part. Some of it stuck - enough to make her inconvenient with a conscience. Then the Flaming Fist offered the perfect compromise: do the work without the theological bollocks. Some called her a thug with a badge; others, a pragmatic idealist. Very few noticed she'd rather be anywhere else.

She calls herself Tav, mostly because it's short and hard to mispronounce.
